These documents clearly establish Roosevelt's crucial role in planning and instigati World War II. They also reveal the forces behind President Roosevelt that pushed f war... If the Polish documents were in fact authentic and genuine, this would mean that President Roosevelt and his representatives had lied to the American public, while the German government told the truth. In 1940, this was far more than the trusting American public could accept.

The Secret Polish Documents

The Germans seized a mass of documents from the Polish Ministry of Foreign Affa when they invaded Warsaw in late September 1939. The documents were seized wh a German SS brigade led by Freiherr von Kuensberg captured the center of Warsaw ahead of the regular German army. Von Kuensberg's men took control of the Polish Foreign Ministry just as Ministry officials were in the process of burning incriminating documents. These documents clearly establish Roosevelt's crucial rol in planning and instigating World War II. They also reveal the forces behind Presid Roosevelt that pushed for war.[1]

Potocki leaving the White House 1939

Some of the secret Polish documents were first published in the United States as Tl German White Paper. Probably the most revealing document in the collection is a secret report dated January 12, 1939, by Jerzy Potocki, the Polish ambassador to the United States. This report discusses the domestic situation in the United States. I quote Ambassador Potocki's report in full:

There is a feeling now prevalent in the United States marked by growing hatred of Fascism, and above all of Chancellor Hitler and everything connected with Nationa Socialism. Propaganda is mostly in the hands of the Jews who control almost 100% the] radio, film, daily and periodical press. Although this propaganda is extremely coarse and presents Germany as black as possible–above all religious persecution a concentration camps are exploited–this propaganda is nevertheless extremely effec since the public here is completely ignorant and knows nothing of the situation in Europe.

At the present moment most Americans regard Chancellor Hitler and National Socialism as the greatest evil and greatest peril threatening the world. The situatio here provides an excellent platform for public speakers of all kinds, for emigrants fr Germany and Czechoslovakia who with a great many words and with most various calumnies incite the public. They praise American liberty which they contrast with totalitarian states.

It is interesting to note that in this extremely well-planned campaign which is conducted above all against National Socialism, Soviet Russia is almost completely eliminated. Soviet Russia, if mentioned at all, is mentioned in a friendly manner an things are presented in such a way that it would seem that the Soviet Union were cooperating with the bloc of democratic states. Thanks to the clever propaganda th sympathies of the American public are completely on the side of Red Spain.

This propaganda, this war psychosis is being artificially created. The American pec are told that peace in Europe is hanging only by a thread and that war is inevitable. the same time the American people are unequivocally told that in case of a world w America also must take an active part in order to defend the slogans of liberty and democracy in the world. President Roosevelt was the first one to express hatred against Fascism. In doing so he was serving a double purpose; first he wanted to div the attention of the American people from difficult and intricate domestic problem especially from the problem of the struggle between capital and labor. Second, by creating a war psychosis and by spreading rumors concerning dangers threatening Europe, he wanted to induce the American people to accept an enormous armamen program which far exceeds United States defense requirements.

Regarding the first point, it must be said that the internal situation on the labor market is growing worse constantly. The unemployed today already number 12 mill Federal and state expenditures are increasing daily. Only the huge sums, running in billions, which the treasury expends for emergency labor projects, are keeping a certain amount of peace in the country. Thus far only the usual strikes and local un have taken place. But how long this government aid can be kept up it is difficult to predict today. The excitement and indignation of public opinion, and the serious conflict between private enterprises and enormous trusts on the one hand, and with labor on the other, have made many enemies for Roosevelt and are causing him ma sleepless nights.

As to point two, I can only say that President Roosevelt, as a clever player of politic and a connoisseur of American mentality, speedily steered public attention away fr the domestic situation in order to fasten it on foreign policy. The way to achieve thi was simple. One needed, on the one hand, to enhance the war menace overhanging world on account of Chancellor Hitler, and, on the other hand, to create a specter b talking about the attack of the totalitarian states on the United States. The Munich pact came to President Roosevelt as a godsend. He described it as the capitulation France and England to bellicose German militarism. As was said here: Hitler compelled Chamberlain at pistol-point. Hence, France and England had no choice had to conclude a shameful peace.

The prevalent hatred against everything which is in any way connected with Germa National Socialism is further kindled by the brutal attitude against the Jews in Germany and by the émigré problem. In this action Jewish intellectuals participate for instance, Bernard Baruch; the Governor of New York State, Lehman; the newly appointed judge of the Supreme Court, Felix Frankfurter; Secretary of the Treasury Morgenthau, and others who are personal friends of Roosevelt. They want the President to become the champion of human rights, freedom of religion and speech and the man who in the future will punish trouble-mongers. These groups, people w want to pose as representatives of "Americanism" and "defenders of democracy" in last analysis, are connected by unbreakable ties with international Jewry.

For this Jewish international, which above all is concerned with the interests of its race, to put the President of the United States at this "ideal" post of champion of human rights, was a clever move. In this manner they created a dangerous hotbed f hatred and hostility in this hemisphere and divided the world into two hostile camp The entire issue is worked out in a mysterious manner. Roosevelt has been forcing t foundation for vitalizing American foreign policy, and simultaneously has been procuring enormous stocks for the coming war, for which the Jews are striving consciously. With regard to domestic policy, it is extremely convenient to divert pul attention from anti-Semitism which is ever growing in the United States, by talkin about the necessity of defending faith and individual liberty against the onslaught c Fascism.[2]

1933: An international declaration was made.

On January 16, 1939, Potocki reported to the Warsaw Foreign Ministry a conversati he had with American Ambassador William Bullitt. Bullitt was in Washington on a brief leave of absence from Paris. Potocki reported that Bullitt stated the main objectives of the Roosevelt administration were:

"The vitalizing foreign policy, under the leadership of President Roosevelt, severely and unambiguously condemns totalitarian countries.

The United States preparation for war on sea, land and air which will be carried ou an accelerated speed and will consume the colossal sum of $1,250 million.

It is the decided opinion of the President that France and Britain must put [an] end any sort of compromise with the totalitarian countries. They must not let themselve in for any discussions aiming at any kind of territorial changes.

They have the moral assurance that the United States will leave the policy of isolati and be prepared to intervene actively on the side of Britain and France in case of wa America is ready to place its whole wealth of money and raw materials at their disposal."[3]

Juliusz (Jules) Łukasiewicz, the Polish ambassador to France, sent a top secret repor from Paris to the Polish Foreign Ministry at the beginning of February 1939. This report outlines the U.S. policy toward Europe as explained to him by William Bullit

A week ago, the Ambassador of the United States, W. Bullitt, returned to Paris after having spent three months holiday in America. Meanwhile, I had two conversations with him which enable me to inform Monsieur Minister on his views regarding the European situation and to give a survey of Washington's policy….

The international situation is regarded by official quarters as extremely serious and being in danger of armed conflict. Competent quarters are of the opinion that if wa should break out between Britain and France on the one hand and Germany and Ita on the other, and Britain and France should be defeated, the Germans would becom dangerous to the realistic interests of the United States on the American continent. For this reason, one can foresee right from the beginning the participation of the United States in the war on the side of France and Britain, naturally after some time had elapsed after the beginning of the war. Ambassador Bullitt expressed this as follows: “Should war break out we shall certainly not take part in it at the beginning but we shall end it.”[4]

On March 7, 1939, Ambassador Potocki sent another remarkably perceptive report Roosevelt’s foreign policy to the Polish government. I quote Potocki’s secret report full:

The foreign policy of the United States right now concerns not only the governmen but the entire American public as well. The most important elements are the public statements of President Roosevelt. In almost every public speech he refers more or explicitly to the necessity of activating foreign policy against the chaos of views and ideologies in Europe. These statements are picked up by the press and then cleverly filtered into the minds of average Americans in such a way as to strengthen their already formed opinions. The same theme is constantly repeated, namely, the dange of war in Europe and saving the democracies from inundation by enemy fascism. In of these public statements there is normally only a single theme, that is, the danger from Nazism and Nazi Germany to world peace.

As a result of these speeches, the public is called upon to support rearmament and t spending of enormous sums for the navy and the air force. The unmistakable idea behind this is that in case of an armed conflict the United States cannot stay out bu must take an active part in the maneuvers. As a result of the effective speeches of President Roosevelt, which are supported by the press, the American public is toda being conscientiously manipulated to hate everything that smacks of totalitarianism and fascism. But it is interesting that the USSR is not included in all of this. The American public considers Russia more in the camp of the democratic states. This was also the case during the Spanish civil war when the so-called Loyalists were regarde as defenders of the democratic idea.

The State Department operates without attracting a great deal of attention, althoug is known that Secretary of State [Cordell] Hull and President Roosevelt swear allegiance to the same ideas. However, Hull shows more reserve than Roosevelt, and loves to make a distinction between Nazism and Chancellor Hitler on the one hand and the German people on the other. He considers this form of dictatorial governm a temporary "necessary evil." In contrast, the State Department is unbelievably interested in the USSR and its internal situation and openly worries itself over its weaknesses and decline. The main reason for the United States interest in the Russians is the situation in the Far East. The current government would be glad to the Red Army emerge as the victor in a conflict with Japan. That's why the sympath of the government are clearly on the side of China, which recently received considerable financial aid amounting to 25 million dollars.

Eager attention is given to all information from the diplomatic posts as well as to th special emissaries of the President who serve as ambassadors of the United States. T President frequently calls his representatives from abroad to Washington for perso exchanges of views and to give them special information and instructions. The arriv of the envoys and ambassadors is always shrouded in secrecy and very little surface the press about the results of their visits. The State Department also takes care to avoid giving out any kind of information about the course of these interviews. The practical way in which the President makes foreign policy is most effective. He give personal instructions to his representatives abroad, most of whom are his personal friends. In this way the United States is led down a dangerous path in world politic with the explicit intention of abandoning the comfortable policy of isolation. The President regards the foreign policy of his country as a means of satisfying his own personal ambition. He listens carefully and happily to his echo in the other capitals the world. In domestic as well as foreign policy, the Congress of the United States i the only object that stands in the way of the President and his government in carryi out his decisions quickly and ambitiously. One hundred and fifty years ago, the Constitution of the United States gave the highest prerogatives to the American parliament which may criticize or reject the law of the White House.

The foreign policy of President Roosevelt has recently been the subject of intense discussion in the lower house and in the Senate, and this has caused excitement. Th so-called Isolationists, of whom there are many in both houses, have come out stron against the President. The representatives and the senators were especially upset ov the remarks of the President, which were published in the press, in which he said th the borders of the United States lie on the Rhine. But President Roosevelt is a super political player and understands completely the power of the American parliament. has his own people there, and he knows how to withdraw from an uncomfortable situation at the right moment.

Very intelligently and cleverly he ties together the question of foreign policy with th issues of American rearmament. He particularly stresses the necessity of spending enormous sums in order to maintain a defensive peace. He says specifically that the United States is not arming in order to intervene or to go to the aid of England or France in case of war, but because of the need to show strength and military preparedness in case of an armed conflict in Europe. In his view this conflict is becoming ever more acute and is completely unavoidable.

Since the issue is presented this way, the houses of Congress have no cause to objec To the contrary, the houses accepted an armament program of more than one billio dollars. (The normal budget is 550 million, the emergency 552 million dollars). However, under the cloak of a rearmament policy, President Roosevelt continues to push forward his foreign policy, which unofficially shows the world that in case of w the United States will come out on the side of the democratic states with all militar and financial power.

In conclusion it can be said that the technical and moral preparation of the Americ people for participation in a war–if one should break out in Europe–is proceeding rapidly. It appears that the United States will come to the aid of France and Great Britain with all its resources right from the beginning. However, I know the Americ public and the representatives and senators who all have the final word, and I am of the opinion that the possibility that America will enter the war as in 1917 is not gre That's because the majority of the states in the mid-West and West, where the rural element predominates, want to avoid involvement in European disputes at all costs. They remember the declaration of the Versailles Treaty and the well-known phrase that the war was to save the world for democracy. Neither the Versailles Treaty nor that slogan have reconciled the United States to that war. For millions there remain only a bitter aftertaste because of unpaid billions which the European states still ov America.[5]

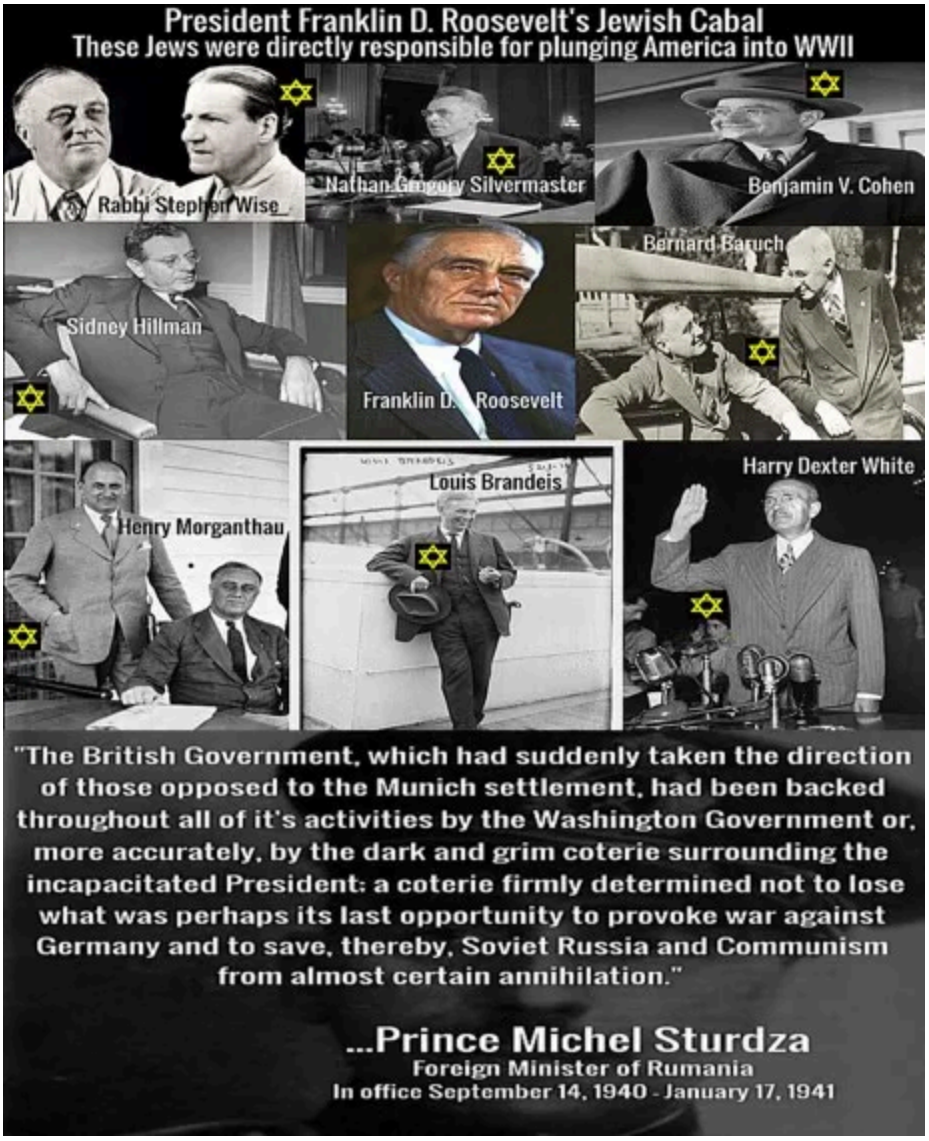
These secret Polish reports were written by top level Polish ambassadors who were necessarily friendly to Germany. However, they understood the realities of Europea politics far better than people who made foreign policy in the United States. The Polish ambassadors realized that behind all of their rhetoric about democracy and human rights, the Jewish leaders in the United States who agitated for war against Germany were deceptively advancing their own interests.



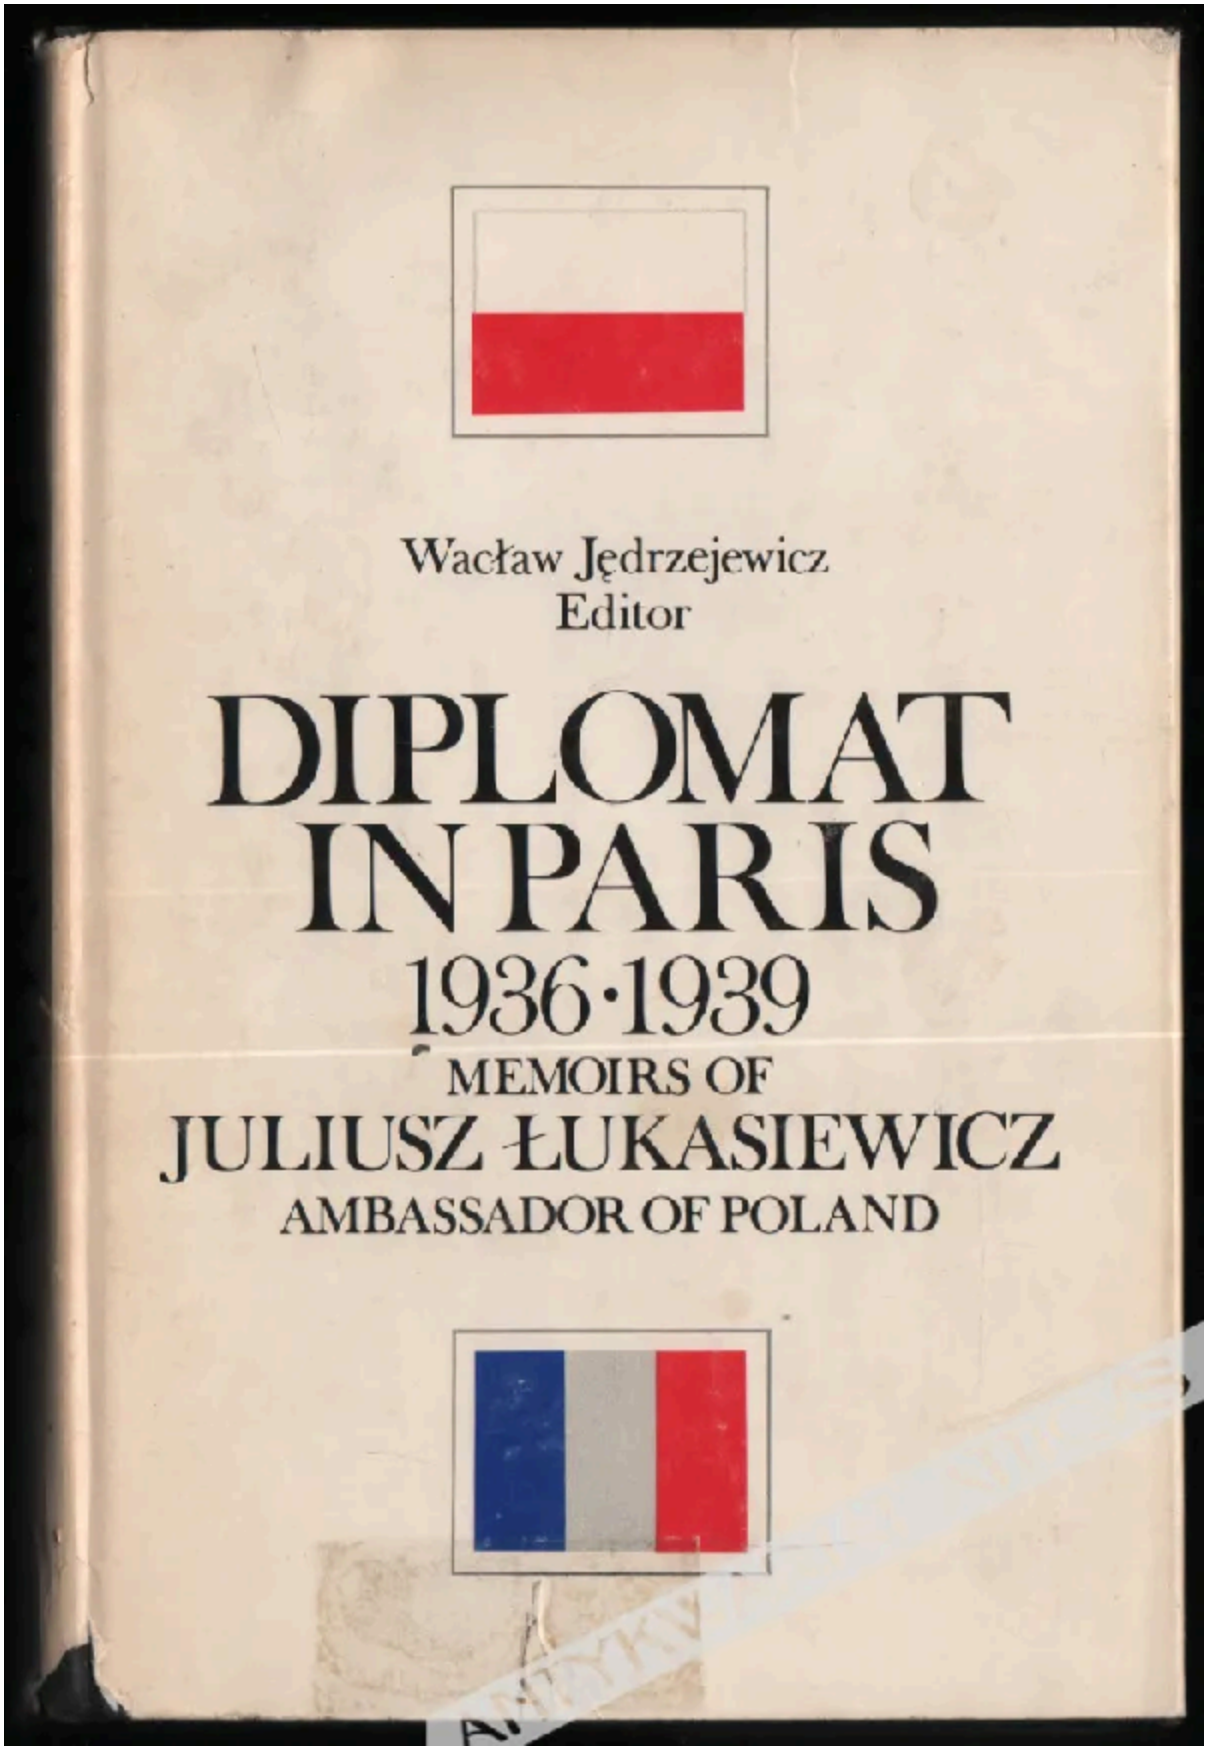
There is no question that the secret documents taken from the Polish Foreign Mini in Warsaw are authentic. Charles C. Tansill considered the documents genuine and stated, “Some months ago I had a long conversation with M. Lipsky, the Polish ambassador in Berlin in the prewar years, and he assured me that the documents in German White Paper are authentic.”[6]

William H. Chamberlain wrote, “I have been privately informed by an extremely reliable source that Potocki, now residing in South America, confirmed the accurac of the documents, so far as he was concerned.”[7] Historian Harry Elmer Barnes als stated,

“Both Professor Tansill and myself have independently established the thorough authenticity of these documents.”[8]

Edward Raczyński, the Polish ambassador to London from 1934 to 1945, confirmed his diary the authenticity of the Polish documents. He wrote in his entry on June 20 1940:

“The Germans published in April a White Book containing documents from the archives of our Ministry of Foreign Affairs, consisting of reports from Potocki from Washington, Łukasiewicz in Paris and myself. I do not know where they found ther since we were told that the archives had been destroyed. The documents are certain genuine, and the facsimiles show that for the most part the Germans got hold of the originals and not merely copies.”[9]



Diplomat In Paris

The official papers and memoirs of Juliusz Łukasiewicz published in 1970 in Diplor in Paris 1936-1939 reconfirmed the authenticity of the Polish documents. Łukasiew was the Polish ambassador to Paris who authored several of the secret Polish documents. The collection was edited by Wacław Jędrzejewicz, a former Polish diplomat and cabinet member. Jędrzejewicz considered the documents made public the Germans absolutely genuine, and quoted from several of them.

Tyler G. Kent, who worked at the U.S. Embassy in London in 1939 and 1940, has als confirmed the authenticity of the secret Polish documents. Kent says that he saw copies of U.S. diplomatic messages in the files which corresponded to the Polish documents. [10]

The German Foreign Office published the Polish documents on March 29, 1940. Th Reich Ministry of Propaganda released the documents to strengthen the case of the American isolationists and to prove the degree of America's responsibility for the outbreak of war. In Berlin, journalists from around the world were permitted to examine the original documents themselves, along with a large number of other documents from the Polish Foreign Ministry. The release of the documents caused international media sensation. American newspapers published lengthy excerpts fr the documents and gave the story large front page headline coverage.[11]

However, the impact of the released documents was far less than the German government had hoped for. Leading U.S. government officials emphatically denoun the documents as not being authentic. William Bullitt, the U.S. ambassador who wa especially incriminated by the documents, stated, "I have never made to anyone the statements attributed to me." Secretary of State Cordell Hull denounced the documents by stating: "I may say most emphatically that neither I nor any of my associates in the Department of State have ever heard of any such conversations as those alleged, nor do we give them the slightest credence. The statements alleged h not represented in any way at any time the thought or the policy of the American government."[12] American newspapers stressed these high-level denials in reporti the release of the Polish documents.

These categorical denials by high-level U.S. government officials almost completely eliminated the effect of the secret Polish documents. The vast majority of the American people in 1940 trusted their elected political leaders to tell the truth. If th Polish documents were in fact authentic and genuine, this would mean that Preside Roosevelt and his representatives had lied to the American public, while the Germa government told the truth. In 1940, this was far more than the trusting American public could accept.

More Evidence Roosevelt Helped Instigate World War II

While the secret Polish documents alone indicate that Roosevelt was preparing the American public for war against Germany, a large amount of complementary evider confirms the conspiracy reported by the Polish ambassadors. The diary of James V. Forrestal, the first U.S. Secretary of Defense, also reveals that Roosevelt and his administration helped start World War II. Forrestal's entry on December 27, 1945, states:

"Played golf today with Joe Kennedy [Roosevelt's Ambassador to Great Britain in th years immediately before the war]. I asked him about his conversations with Roosev and Neville Chamberlain from 1938 on. He said Chamberlain's position in 1938 was that England had nothing with which to fight and that she could not risk going to v with Hitler. Kennedy's view: That Hitler would have fought Russia without any late conflict with England if it had not been for Bullitt's urging on Roosevelt in the summer of 1939 that the Germans must be faced down about Poland; neither the French nor the British would have made Poland a cause of war if it had not been for the constant needling from Washington. Bullitt, he said, kept telling Roosevelt that Germans wouldn't fight; Kennedy that they would, and that they would overrun Europe. Chamberlain, he says, stated that America and the world Jews had forced England into the war. In his telephone conversations with Roosevelt in the summer 1939 the President kept telling him to put some iron up Chamberlain's backside. Kennedy's response always was that putting iron up his backside did no good unless the British had some iron with which to fight, and they did not….

What Kennedy told me in this conversation jibes substantially with the remarks Clarence Dillon had made to me already, to the general effect that Roosevelt had as him in some manner to communicate privately with the British to the end that Chamberlain should have greater firmness in his dealings with Germany. Dillon tol me that at Roosevelt's request he had talked with Lord Lothian in the same general sense as Kennedy reported Roosevelt having urged him to do with Chamberlain. Lothian presumably was to communicate to Chamberlain the gist of his conversatic with Dillon.

Looking backward there is undoubtedly foundation for Kennedy's belief that Hitler attack could have been deflected to Russia…."[13]

Joseph Kennedy is known to have had a good memory, and it is highly likely that Kennedy's statements to James Forrestal are accurate. Forrestal died on May 22, 194 under mysterious circumstances when he fell from his hospital window.

Sir Ronald Lindsay, the British Ambassador to Washington, confirmed Roosevelt's secret policy to instigate war against Germany with the release of a confidential diplomatic report after the war. The report describes a secret meeting on Septembe 18, 1938, between Roosevelt and Ambassador Lindsay. Roosevelt said that if Britain and France were forced into a war against Germany, the United States would ultimately join the war. Roosevelt's idea to start a war was for Britain and France to impose a blockade against Germany without actually declaring war. The important point was to call it a defensive war based on lofty humanitarian grounds and on the desire to wage hostilities with a minimum of suffering and the least possible loss of life and property. The blockade would provoke some kind of German military response, but would free Britain and France from having to declare war. Roosevelt believed he could then convince the American public to support war against Germa including shipments of weapons to Britain and France, by insisting that the United States was still neutral in a non-declared conflict.[14]

Sir Ronald Lindsay

President Roosevelt told Ambassador Lindsay that if news of their conversation wa ever made public, it could mean Roosevelt's impeachment. What Roosevelt propose to Lindsay was in effect a scheme to violate the U.S. Constitution by illegally startir war. For this and other reasons, Ambassador Lindsay stated that during his three ye of service in Washington he developed little regard for America's leaders.[15]

Ambassador Lindsay in a series of final reports also indicated that Roosevelt was delighted at the prospect of a new world war. Roosevelt promised Lindsay that he would delay German ships under false pretenses in a feigned search for arms. This would allow the German ships to be easily seized by the British under circumstance arranged with exactitude between the American and British authorities. Lindsay reported that Roosevelt

"spoke in a tone of almost impish glee and though I may be wrong the whole busine gave me the impression of resembling a school-boy prank."

Ambassador Lindsay was personally perturbed that the President of the United Sta could be gay and joyful about a pending tragedy which seemed so destructive of the hopes of all mankind. It was unfortunate at this important juncture that the United States had a President whose emotions and ideas were regarded by a friendly Britis Ambassador as being childish.[16]

Roosevelt's desire to support France and England in a war against Germany is discussed in a letter from Verne Marshall, former editor of the Cedar Rapids Gazett to Charles C. Tansill. The letter states:

President Roosevelt wrote a note to William Bullitt [in the summer of 1939], then Ambassador to France, directing him to advise the French Government that if, in th event of a Nazi attack upon Poland, France and England did not go to Poland's aid, those countries could expect no help from America if a general war developed. On t other hand, if France and England immediately declared war on Germany, they cou expect "all aid" from the United States.

F.D.R.'s instructions to Bullitt were to send this word along to "Joe" and "Tony," meaning Ambassadors Kennedy, in London, and Biddle, in Warsaw, respectively. F.D.R. wanted Daladier, Chamberlain and Josef Beck to know of these instructions Bullitt. Bullitt merely sent his note from F.D.R. to Kennedy in the diplomatic pouch from Paris. Kennedy followed Bullitt's idea and forwarded it to Biddle. When the N grabbed Warsaw and Beck disappeared, they must have come into possession of the F.D.R. note. The man who wrote the report I sent you saw it in Berlin in October, 19 [17]

William Phillips, the American Ambassador to Italy, also stated in his postwar memoirs that the Roosevelt administration in late 1938 was committed to going to on the side of Britain and France. Phillips wrote:

"On this and many other occasions, I would have liked to have told him [Count Cia the Italian Foreign Minister] frankly that in the event of a European war, the United States would undoubtedly be involved on the side of the Allies. But in view of my official position, I could not properly make such a statement without instructions fr Washington, and these I never received."[18]

When Anthony Eden returned to England in December 1938, he carried with him a assurance from President Roosevelt that the United States would enter as soon as practicable a European war against Hitler if the occasion arose. This information w obtained by Senator William Borah of Idaho, who was debating how and when to gi out this information when he dropped dead in his bathroom. The story was confirm to historian Harry Elmer Barnes by some of Senator Borah's closest colleagues at th time.[19]

The American Ambassador to Poland, Anthony Drexel Biddle, was an ideological colleague of President Roosevelt and a good friend of William Bullitt. Roosevelt use Biddle to influence the Polish government not to enter into negotiations with Germany. Carl J. Burckhardt, the League of Nations High Commissioner to Danzig reported in his postwar memoirs on a memorable conversation he had with Biddle.

December 2, 1938, Biddle told Burckhardt with remarkable satisfaction that the Pol were ready to wage war over Danzig. Biddle predicted that in April a new crisis wou develop, and that moderate British and French leaders would be blown away by pub opinion. Biddle predicted a holy war against Germany would break out.[20]

Bernard Baruch, who was Roosevelt's chief advisor, scoffed at a statement made on March 10, 1939, by Neville Chamberlain that "the outlook in international affairs is tranquil." Baruch agreed passionately with Winston Churchill, who had told him:

"War is coming very soon. We will be in it and you [the United States] will be in it."|

Georges Bonnet, the French Foreign Minister in 1939, also confirmed the role of William Bullitt as Roosevelt's ambassador in pushing France into war. In a letter to Hamilton Fish dated March 26, 1971, Bonnet wrote,

"One thing is certain is that Bullitt in 1939 did everything he could to make France enter the war."[22]

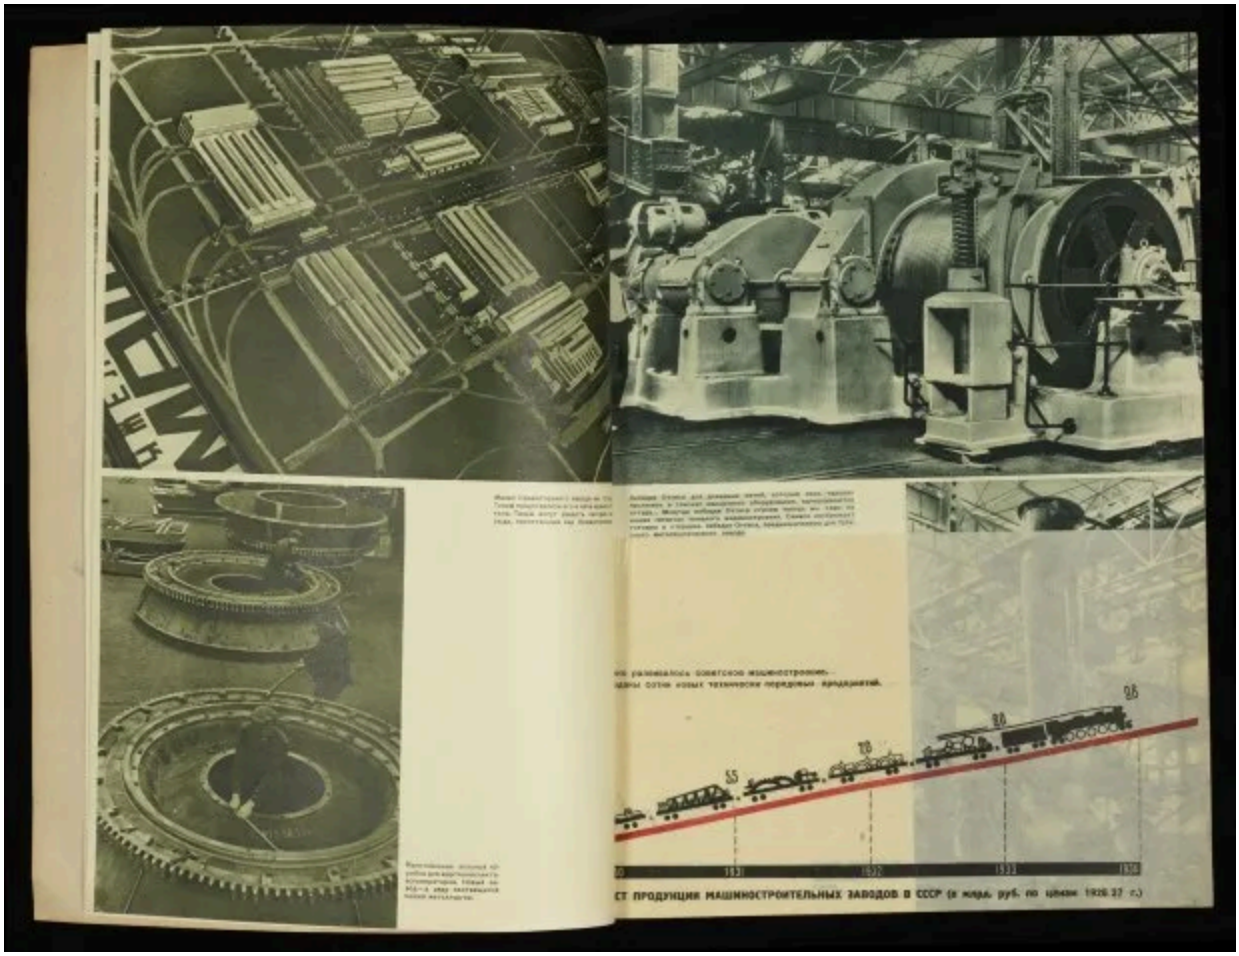
Dr. Edvard Beneš, the former President of Czechoslovakia, wrote in his memoirs th he had a lengthy secret conversation at Hyde Park with President Roosevelt on May 28, 1939. Roosevelt assured Dr. Beneš that the United States would actively interver on the side of Great Britain and France against Germany in the anticipated Europea war.[23]

American newspaper columnist Karl von Wiegand, who was the chief European newspaper columnist of the International News Service, met with Ambassador William Bullitt at the U.S. embassy in Paris on April 25, 1939. More than four mont before the outbreak of war, Bullitt told Wiegand:

"War in Europe has been decided upon. Poland has the assurance of the support of Britain and France, and will yield to no demands from Germany. America will be in the war soon after Britain and France enter it."[24]

When Wiegand said that in the end Germany would be driven into the arms of Sovi Russia and Bolshevism, Ambassador Bullitt replied:

“What of it. There will not be enough Germans left when the war is over to be wort Bolshevizing.”[25]



5 Year Plans & Mega-Factories For An Offensive Army: From the early 1930’s Amer provided significant resources and technical expertise for the construction of massi factories in the Soviet Union that were used to produce military equipment. Wester technology was the main key to success. The Soviet Union became the world’s bigg importer of machinery and equipment in the early 1930s. The lives of the people in Soviet Union were not improved with the Soviet industrialization. Stalin let his people’s standard of living drop extremely low to focus practically all of the Soviet Union’s industrial production on military expansion. This was known by the Ameri government and publicised by people including Elizabeth Dilling (below): “Our fam trip to Red Russia in 1931 started my dedication to anti-Communism. We were take behind the scenes by friends working for the Soviet Government and saw deplorabl conditions, first hand. We were appalled, not only at the forced labor, the squalid crowded living quarters, the breadline rationcard workers’ stores, the mothers push wheelbarrows and the begging children of the State nurseries besieging us.”

“In the Museum of the Revolution we were shown a huge world map. As our Guide turned a switch, lights came on indicating the places all over the world where

Communist Party headquarters were then functioning. Proudly our Guide announc "Our world revolution will start with China and end with the UNITED STATES"."

On March 14, 1939, Slovakia dissolved the state of Czechoslovakia by declaring itse an independent republic. Czechoslovakia President Emil Hácha signed a formal agreement the next day with Hitler establishing a German protectorate over Bohem and Moravia, which constituted the Czech portion of the nation. The British government initially accepted the new situation, reasoning that Britain's guarantee Czechoslovakia given after Munich was rendered invalid by the internal collapse of Czech state. It soon became evident after the proclamation of the Protectorate of Bohemia-Moravia that the new regime enjoyed considerable popularity among the Czechs. Also, the danger of a war between the Czechs and the Slovaks had been averted.[26]

However, Bullitt's response to the creation of the German protectorate over Bohem and Moravia was highly unfavorable. Bullitt telephoned Roosevelt and, in an "almo hysterical" voice, Bullitt urged Roosevelt to make a dramatic denunciation of Germ and to immediately ask Congress to repeal the Neutrality Act.[27]

Washington journalists Drew Pearson and Robert S. Allen reported in their nationa syndicated column that on March 16, 1939, President Roosevelt "sent a virtual ultimatum to Chamberlain" demanding that the British government strongly oppos Germany. Pearson and Allen reported that "the President warned that Britain coul expect no more support, moral or material through the sale of airplanes, if the Mun policy continued."[28]

Responding to Roosevelt's pressure, the next day Chamberlain ended Britain's polic of cooperation with Germany when he made a speech at Birmingham bitterly denouncing Hitler. Chamberlain also announced the end of the British "appeaseme policy, stating that from now on Britain would oppose any further territorial moves Hitler. Two weeks later the British government formally committed itself to war in case of German-Polish hostilities.

In 1939 the slaughter of ethnic Germans commenced in Poland, in formerly Germa territory. Even children had their eyes gauged out. Well over 50,000 German civilia were murdered without any outrage from the Allied leaders. Read here.

Roosevelt also attempted to arm Poland so that Poland would be more willing to go war against Germany. Ambassador Bullitt reported from Paris in a confidential telegram to Washington on April 9, 1939, his conversation with Polish Ambassador Łukasiewicz. Bullitt told Łukasiewicz that although U.S. law prohibited direct financial aid to Poland, the Roosevelt administration might be able to supply war planes to Poland indirectly through Britain. Bullitt stated:

"The Polish Ambassador asked me if it might not be possible for Poland to obtain financial help and airplanes from the United States. I replied that I believed the Johnson Act would forbid any loans from the United States to Poland, but added th it might be possible for England to purchase planes for cash in the United States an turn them over to Poland."[29]

Bullitt also attempted to bypass the Neutrality Act and supply France with airplane secret conference of Ambassador Bullitt with French Premier Daladier and the Fre Minister of Aviation, Guy La Chambre, discussed the procurement of airplanes fro America for France. Bullitt, who was in frequent telephonic conversation with Roosevelt, suggested a means by which the Neutrality Act could be circumvented i the event of war. Bullitt's suggestion was to set up assembly plants in Canada, apparently on the assumption that Canada would not be a formal belligerent in the war. Bullitt also arranged for a secret French mission to come to the United States a purchase airplanes in the winter of 1938-1939. The secret purchase of American airplanes by the French leaked out when a French aviator crashed on the West Coas [30]

On August 23, 1939, Sir Horace Wilson, Chamberlain's closest advisor, went to American Ambassador Joseph Kennedy with an urgent appeal from Chamberlain to President Roosevelt. Regretting that Britain had unequivocally obligated itself to Poland in case of war, Chamberlain now turned to Roosevelt as a last hope for peac Kennedy telephoned the State Department and stated:

"The British want one thing from us and one thing only, namely that we put pressu on the Poles. They felt that they could not, given their obligations, do anything of tl sort but that we could."

Presented with a possibility to save the peace in Europe, President Roosevelt reject Chamberlain's desperate plea out of hand. With Roosevelt's rejection, Kennedy reported, British Prime Minister Chamberlain lost all hope. Chamberlain stated:

"The futility of it all is the thing that is frightful. After all, we cannot save the Poles We can merely carry on a war of revenge that will mean the destruction of all Europe."[31]

For those with eyes and ears, and a semblance of intelligence, we know that there is something t fooky going on. Yet most citizens of the world are blind and deaf to the true cause of this inhum dare not mention the source of this creation, other than it is satanic and evil. My God knows, and must allow this Revelation to play out. Pick a side, pray, and protect yourselves, it does not end w the fence-sitter!
